1. I have been thinking of you a great deal lately.

Oh, fairy feet! Sweet fairy feet!
 Let Beauty's charms fade one by one—
 With Fate's stern power I'll not compete
 If Fate will spare the Pieds Mignons,
 Dainty and never indiscreet—
 Sweet Jenny's twinkling fairy feet.
 Temple Bar.

The customs and fashions of our fathers have been deemed capable of improvement. Quarters that had been fashionable have been gradually deserted. The glory of Bloomsbury and Baker-street, the gayest of the gay, the most attractive of the attractions at the beginning of the century, met at the Strand and South Kensington, once noted for its markets and gardens, are now the districts frequented by the great world, and by those who wish to be thought within its circle. The old taverns of the Strand and Fleet-street, the neighbourhood of the city, and the gayest of the gay, the most attractive of the attractions at the beginning of the century, met at the Strand and South Kensington, once noted for its markets and gardens, are now the districts frequented by the great world, and by those who wish to be thought within its circle. The old taverns of the Strand and Fleet-street, the neighbourhood of the city, and the gayest of the gay, the most attractive of the attractions at the beginning of the century, met at the Strand and South Kensington, once noted for its markets and gardens, are now the districts frequented by the great world, and by those who wish to be thought within its circle. The old taverns of the Strand and Fleet-street, the neighbourhood of the city, and the gayest of the gay, the most attractive of the attractions at the beginning of the century, met at the Strand and South Kensington, once noted for its markets and gardens, are now the districts frequented by the great world, and by those who wish to be thought within its circle.

The best-time for taking a peep at a Lant-street kitchen is when the earliest arrivals (and they, as a rule, are those whose circumstances are awful, inasmuch as they do not feel compelled to "work" after a night's rest) come home, bringing with them the "lodgers" trooping in in the space of half an hour, and each one sharper for his evening meal, and with only one fire available for the cooking purpose, it may be easily imagined that the grate which contains it must be a capacious one—look unrequitedly it extends to a length of five or six yards with a corresponding breadth. These, however, who have suppers to prepare are not fastidious. There is but one gas-frying-pan, and in this are deposited at one or times chops, steaks, kidneys, rashers of bacon and sausages; the result, of this promiscuous mingling of meats being found to give a pleasant pungency for the gravy, which fairly divides the cooking, and the depositors submit to the contribution. It is a stirring spectacle, when the cooking is at its height, to contemplate the tattered, dirty-faced, haggard, each with a plate hurried to his breast and a knife in his hand, keeping a vigilant eye on his particular morsel, frazzling in the pan, lest some lazeurous fork should be present, and snuck in it for his cooking indulgence in this play, practice, it is deemed prudent to constitute the kitchen "elder" master of the cooking ceremonies. This Functionary is commonly possessed of muscular qualifications equal to the settlement of any serious disagreement that may take place between two or more lodgers; and moreover, with an iron脾, and a head strong enough to impale an offender, but it is as much as he can do to maintain order amongst his clients until he is permitted faithfully to render each man his own. The difficulty arises from the process of cooking altering the complexion of the pieces of meat in the pan, and affording the question of identity. This, the knowing "elder" settles, and he, and the others are said to emerge from "That's mine with the notch out in the fat" "That's mine with the cross on it!" "Drop that now, Larry! Yours is a little bit as I can swear is mine, from its having a pink streak in it!" But after all, there is, more horse-play than hot blood, and bad temper displayed, and in a few minutes the "elder" has put the cluster of steel against earthenware, and the champing of voracious jaws. It is not until the general supper is being disposed of that what may be called the tag rag and bobtail make their appearance—the street-singers, and players on musical instruments, the crosing sweepers, the penny-paperhawkers, the sign-light sellers, and the long-legged hawkers, who, in a long journey and making their halting-places for the night, if not until ten or eleven o'clock, when the kitchen is full and the outer door is closed that the fun begins; the song-singing, the story-telling, and the ordinary enjoyment of a common lodging-house domestic. I doubt all this, coming from the mouths of such a motley assemblage, in something like order, but to make them objects of decency and decorum is simply impossible. This is terribly bad for the young folk, the mere boys and girls who accompany the parents. As for the grown-up raffians, it is already as bad as bad, can be so, and an amount of evil stealing into the kitchen, and being indulged in, but for the children it is shocking. And by and by, the crowd dividing, the merry crows troop off—bad—the little boys with the grown men, and the little girls with the grown women, and in the dormitories the pretty story-begun in the kitchen will be completed, until all of them—worn out with the tales, the tales, and the tales, morning takes the place of late telling, and Lant-street, the ugly, the ugly, his sleep.—From "London Society."

pay to the sacred tree. They dwell entirely in caves, hollowed out of the limestone rocks in their hills, and are one of the smallest of races, the men seldom exceeding five inches in height. The vegetation is a dense forest, as the Hottentots call it, composed of 400 feet above the level of the deserts, and near its eastern extremity, is a deep tarn-like lake, about a mile in diameter, the sluggish waters of which overflow into a tortuous reedy canal, which passes into the recesses of a black forest—jungle, black forest, the Hottentots call it. The southern side leads to the heart of the forbidding and seemingly impenetrable forest. Along this path the explorer, accompanied by his friend Henrick, made for the forest. "Henrick," he said, "led the way. I followed closely, and behind me curious rattle snakes, crocodons, and alligators followed. I did not tell the natives to bear to cry, 'Tape Tape!'" and Henrick sobbing forth said, "Look!" The sluggish acid-like streamer wound slowly by, and in bare spots it did bend was the most singular of trees. I have called it the Crocodon, because when its leaves are in motion they resemble the crocodon. I saw the well-known fossil the crocodon of St. Cuthbert's heads. It was now at rest, however, and I will try to describe it to you. If you can imagine a fine apple, eight feet high and thick in proportion, resting upon its base, and denuded of leaves, you will have a good idea of the tree. The trunk is about two feet in diameter, like a large, blunt stick to the ground, like dogs slung back of their hinders. These waves, which were joined at the top of the trunk, and were long and shaped very much like the American an gnave of Century pine. They were two feet through in their thickest part and three feet wide, tapering to sharp point the looked like a cow's horn, very convex on the outer (but now under) surface of the trunk. This convexity was likely set with very strong thorny hooks, like those upon the head of the teazel. These leaves, hanging thus limp and lifeless, dead green colour, had in appearance the massive strength of oak fibre. The apex of the trunk was a small plate set with a larger one. This was not a flower, but a receptacle, at there exuded into a clear, treac liquid, honey-sweet, and possessed of violent intoxicating and soporific properties. From underneath the rim, so to speak,

A REMINISCENCE.

The Bedfordshire Times says—"It has been stated that the deceased Harriet Staunton was a niece of the late Lady Hamilton. The late Lady Hamilton was a very humble person. Her father was a fisherman at Brighton, and she, being remarkably light-headed, and remarkably fond of pleasure and gaiety, came to grief. She then appeared in town, where, as 'Nolly Holmes,' she was what is called 'successful' in her career, and, strange to say, kept free from intemperate habits. She thus saved a goodly sum of money, and, being of generous disposition, she was not without several lending a little to her favourite lovers in pecuniary distress. One of her favourites—'Handsome Horace Pitt,' to wit—was almost always in this position, and Mistress Nelly relieved his need. Till ultimately Horace stood her debtor to the tune of £2,000. Of course, he could not pay her—poor Horace never could pay any body; but when his fair creditor began to 'dun him,' he hit on a very good expedient. He called on her, and, as a present, offered her a new account. He offered to marry her, and, after a little hesitation, she accepted her debtor's hand. Thus wert thou united, Nelly, knowing absolutely nothing of her husband's prospects. As matters turned out, to everybody's surprise, Horace Pitt fell heir to the earldom of Rivers, and poor Nelly Holmes suddenly found herself a real 'lady countess.' She never forgot her poor friends 'Handsome Horace' and 'Nolly Holmes,' and she settled on herself, she provided for her sister's child, the poor creature who has much to do with such a shocking death at Fenny.

—Speaking of Hutton, an ancient local historian, the Derbyshire Times says:—"Perhaps the most curious of the stories told by Hutton relates to his own ancestors. A soldier in Cromwell's army, passing with his comrade over Derby's St. Mary's-bridge, observed a young girl lading water from the river. The spirit of frolic and mischief he threw a large stone, increasing, as he thought, the girl's grief by the splash. But it struck her on the head, and made a hideous wound. She fell into the river. The soldier did not wait to see that she was rescued. He galloped on, feeling that he had been guilty of a wanton murder. The unknown consequences of his folly proved upon his mind. His conscience was always upbraiding him. Years after, when discharged from the army, he settled down in Derby. He took a public house on Bridge-gate, and after a short acquaintance with a woman of suitable age, married. Very soon after he saw his wife's face in the water, and inquired how she got that great scar which disfigured one side of her head. She replied: "Some wretch of a soldier had once nearly killed her with a stone, but if ever she caught that man she would pay him off for it." It is not recorded how she punished her husband when he confessed being her assailant, or how great was his relief when the haunting thought of wanton murder was removed from his mind. He was one of those who were hanged at Bescoold, and I cordially recommend Hutton's quaint story to novel-writers in search of a trick."

The Chinese have lately erected a temple in Nevada which, from the description given by it in the Virginia City Chronicle, seems to be, in its way, a model of church architecture. On both sides of the door are gigantic figures of about life size, representing the gods of good and evil. Each has one leg lifted in the air, and they look like Chinese gods dancing. "dimple chag," Banners and lanterns displayed on the walls outside; within is an altar, covered with burning junk, incense, varnished hog-incense, and little metal ornaments, surrounded by feathers and paper ornaments. The walls are hung with pictures portraying the terrors of a future punishment and the rewards of heaven. A picture of hell is depicted by a man sitting at a small circle over with big folding doors, by the side of which sits the devil. Subordinating devils are seen driving the sinners towards his spot, while the big devil, viewing the procession with a look of satisfaction, is just reaching for his forked spear without hands and taking the keys out of his waistcoat pocket with the other. Another picture represents the judgment. An immense figure sits at a big desk judging, the sinners are all there, and each is being examined as he enters into a furnace of fire below, while clerk at the right of the desk checks off the names in a large book. One picture represents a woman beating the devil over the head with a club, the heathens' gods appear in the joys of paradise are depicted by number of persons sitting on clouds of glory and dining on roast pig, while angels hover above and fan off the flies.

"A Russian gentleman told me that he had been arrested in a strike against the annual tax levied by the government; by some police agent. Some years ago a certain Russian poet indulged too freely in reading the literature of the barricades. He became filled with the wildest Republican notions, and the spirit of propaganda seized on him. He had read 'Felix Holt,' but he knew the same plan as did the English revolutionaries. He wanted to speak in public; he dared not write what he thought; but he was wont see the working-men, the trimmers, the drovers, the long-shore men, in their own launts. He would sit for hours contentedly inbibing vodka, and chatting away on the most tremendous topics—One evening a brilliant idea struck him. He decided his best course was to become a slave of color on 'Equality.' Calling the landlords, he said, 'Bring me a plate of peas.' The vegetables arrived. 'Now,' said the agitator, picking up several peas, and setting them apart from the others, 'there is to you, Tsar, here is the Finance Minister, here is the Chancellor, here is the War Minister, here is the Archbishop, and here I am. You must now pick them out easily.' Then suddenly whirling the plate round so that the peas were once more mixed in a great mass, the demonstrator said—'Poff! That is a revolution! Now where is the Tsar? Where are the ministers?' The illustration was received with great applause, and they have led it off ever since. The agitators, however, who had altogether failed to escape the pressure of couple of police spies. Next day came the inevitable sequel. The sweet singer was arrested, underwent a five days' trial, and is at this present moment confined in Siberia. Decidedly Pouchkine and Schouvaloff are a brace of notable Londoners."
